

Fabiana Fusco has a degree in Foreign Languages and Literatures from the University of Udine, she spent periods of training and research in various locations (Macerata University for her Ph.D and Zurich and Graz universities for specialization courses). She teaches Linguistics and Gender Studies at the University of Udine. Her main research interests can be traced to the following strands: a) observation of the Italian and Friulian sociolinguistic context in all its dimensions and with particular attention to social variation; b) the study of plurilingualism, plurilingual education and linguistic minorities in the Friulian territory, including the so-called 'new minorities', as an essential component of urban plurilingualism); c) the study of the correlation between translation and linguistic interference with "application" analysis in the various sectors of translation studies (dubbing, comics and re-translation) (the list of her publications can be found in the research catalogue Cineca IRIS of the University of Udine, <https://air.uniud.it>). She also carries out teaching activities in the field of plurilingual and Italian education as L2 at various Italian and foreign institutions and linguistic consultancy on gender equality issues for local authorities and public administrations.

She is the Head of the Department Languages and Literatures, Communication, Education and Society and of the International Center of Plurilingualism (University of Udine).
